Lord Stanley on Conservative Neutrality

Lord Stanley speaking at King's Lynn, 10th July—
"I do not like to interfere with what others do, but it seems to me, that which is worth less per se is less important, than that which is worth less per se reproduced—the charge that a Conservative Government, at least, is disposed to involve England in war. (Hear, hear.) I do not understand what historical basis of fact that imputes that to (A. V.)—America." (Hear, hear.) Very well, then, America. And then, there is another charge, that our country has taken an active part that was not intended. (Hear, hear.) That is, that we have carried on, not by any Conservative Ministry but by two successive Liberal Administrations. (Hear, hear.) It is going to be a very long time before we can get rid of that.
(Laughter.) Even if the popular voice to those translators is correct, which there's every reason to believe it is, that Lord Derby and his colleagues had continued in office in 1858, at the time when the Italian war broke out, we would have been in a more neutral position, and the feeling of the Government in 1859, because that Government I was a member, and I say so with entire frankness, was that it was the idea of this Government that the idea of a united Italy was a most dangerous thing, and that the Italian movement was a most dangerous thing, and that it was the object of the Government to stop it. (Hear, hear.)
